Transplanted Scandinavians are getting together for a lot of fun in the Blue Grass.

The Scandinavian Heritage Group is officially organized and more than 60 families celebrated Monday night.

They were the guests of Lars and Gunvar LaCour at Clovelly Farm on the Paris Pike.

Some came in costumes of their native countries and refreshments represented some of the finest in Scandinavian foods. Mr. and Mrs. Aimo Klvinleemi presented a group of native songs while gloogg, a native drink made with wine, spices and fruit, was served to the adults.

The Heritage Group is the brainchild of three local women who decided one day they were reaching the age when they wanted to carry on their heritage and expose others to it.

The founders are Jane Robertson, Alice Fortner (Mrs. Harry T.), and Jackie Foltz.

The three are amazed at the response. They agree that the group has just "mushroomed," which is particularly amazing since the whole organizing has been by word of mouth.

However Mrs. Foltz says she and the other two ladies have worked hard at trying to locate prospective members. Wherever they went they listened for anything that sounded like an accent. "We even found some in grocery stores," she says. The women put a note in a church bulletin

Mrs. Ruth Hamrin lights the candles on a crown worn by her daughter Rebecca. It's part of a Scandinavian ceremony celebrating the holidays. The recently formed Scandinavian Heritage Society will celebrate the feast of Lights Dec. 13 at Faith Lutheran Church.
